Akira Kurosawa is one of the most influential directors in film history. His films, such as Seven Samurai and Rashomon, have left an indelible mark on the art of filmmaking. In Something Like an Autobiography, Kurosawa reflects on his childhood, his struggles, and his triumphs as a filmmaker.

The book is a collection of interviews that were conducted over a period of several years. In these interviews, Kurosawa discusses his early life in Japan, his experiences during World War II, and his career as a filmmaker. He also shares his thoughts on art, creativity, and the nature of cinema.

Something Like an Autobiography is a fascinating and intimate glimpse into the life of a filmmaking legend. Kurosawa's insights into the art of filmmaking are invaluable, and his personal anecdotes are both entertaining and inspiring. This book is a must-read for any fan of Kurosawa's work or anyone interested in the art of filmmaking.
